

NEW ADVANCES IN CRIME AND SOCIAL HARM

Call for Proposals

Series Editors: Professor David Nelken, Professor of Comparative and Transnational Law, King's College London, UK; Professor Claire Hamilton, School of Law and Criminology, Maynooth University, Ireland.

Given the 'vertigo' of recent times – unprecedented climate change and political upheaval amid devastating wars and on the heels of a pandemic – criminological debates on the organisation of authority in society have never seemed so relevant. Partly in response to these developments, criminological scholarship has expanded exponentially, with thriving subfields on green criminology, border criminology, social harms and human rights, security and victimology, to name but a few. Against this background, this series encourages submissions that seek to probe the boundaries of the discipline through the lens of both crime and social harm. Up-and-coming scholars seeking to extend the criminological gaze through a harms-based perspective are particularly welcome. Existing volumes include discussions of: new technologies and privacy; crimmigration; new frameworks for understanding comparative penology such as political culture and social exclusion; and critiques of existing accounts of environmental harm and regulation. Both monographs and edited collections are welcome.
